Kids (and Parents) Need Routine
by Jenna Scott Theparentcue.org

“For young children, it’s all about how they understand the world around them. Since they don’t fully grasp the concept of time yet, they order their lives around the events that happen in a day. So when events happen in a predictable pattern, you help them better understand their world. This allows them to feel more confident and secure.

Essentially, routines assure young children that their needs will be met.

And while routines help build trust between kids and their parents, inconsistency does the exact opposite and creates emotional anxiety. And who needs any more of that?”
